

Evening on the Marsh

The tide draws back across the marsh and leaves the mud to breathe; a heron folds its patient neck, the reeds begin to seethe.

The last light thins along the dyke, the wind forgets its name, and every pool the water leaves holds up a little flame.

The village bells are far and slow, the road is cold and bare, and something in the failing light is almost like a prayer.